Nothing Is Insignificant

Posted by Steve - 21 Mar 2011 16:46

Hey All:

We headed out to Oaklawn Cemetery yesterday again. Yes, you will notice that we are spending some time out there and might be wondering why we haven't moved on to another site. One of the things we'll be doing when we go to a site is taking the time to connect with the area and its spiritual occupants. A quick in and out will not be our style; not that there is anything wrong with that.

We are taking the opportunity to get educated as we spend time in this place. Every trip provides a different experience. Case in point: We were walking through the area and were drawn to a different area of the cemetery. We had not gone to this area before. In the back of the cemetery, there was a lone grave, surrounded by the old iron fencing. The gravesite was unkept and there was nothing cosmetically appealing to it; but there was a drawing to the grave that was unmistakeable. The tombstone was difficult to read and very worn. Between taking photos, my wife would get down on the ground and attempt to read the tombstone. When she finally was able to make out the writing, the date of death was March 20, 1907. We were there at the gravesite on the anniversary of this person's death. You could not make out the name but you got a sense that this grave belonged to a female.

I will upload a photo of this gravesite once we've had a chance to sift through all pics and do some editing.

As stated in the subject line, nothing is insignificant. Follow what you feel when investigating an area; even if no one else is feeling it. You may just get more than you planned on.

==========

Re: Nothing Is Insignificant

Posted by believer - 21 Mar 2011 17:00

I agree 100% and NEVER overlook the "obvious"!

==========

Re: Nothing Is Insignificant

Posted by Steve - 21 Mar 2011 17:06

---

believer wrote:

I agree 100% and NEVER overlook the "obvious"!

Well said. Is that one of the reason's you're a believer?

==========